

Erin Mills

Community Profile

History

During the 1800s land in Erin Mills was mainly used for farming scattered along the major roads. Two other communities existed at that time, Erindale to the east and the hamlet of Frogmore, located at the present day intersection of Dundas Street West and Winston Churchill Boulevard.

In the 1950s Edward Plunkett Taylor began buying farm land for future development by Canadian Equity and Development Limited, which owned Don Mills Development Corporation. In 1969 Don Mills Development Corporation announced its plan to build a "New Town" in four phases. The first two phases, Erin Mills South and Erin Mills West, today form the Erin Mills Community.

The first phase, Erin Mills South, was built in the early 1970s. Also at this time the Erin Mills Information Pavilion was built for potential buyers and residents. The services offered at the pavilion included sales and decorating advice and brochures on the services and facilities in Mississauga. Many community groups used the pavilion as a meeting room and staff organized picnics, concerts and tours of the new subdivision.

Erin Mills West, phase two of the "New Town" development was completed in the mid 1980s. This area was part of the Town of Oakville until 1974, when with the advent of regional government, the City of Mississauga was established and its westerly boundary extended to Ninth Line north of Dundas Street West. These lands then became part of Mississauga.

Today, Erin Mills offers shopping facilities, a university, community facilities, a variety of residential dwellings, a connected open space system and employment opportunities.
